

Newspaper Accounts of Major Leaguers in World War Military Service: Uncovering Hidden Stories of Sacrifice and Patriotism

The outbreak of World War II in 1939 sent shockwaves through the world, and its impact was felt in every corner of society, including the world of sports. Major League Baseball, the pinnacle of American professional baseball, was no exception. As the United States entered the war, hundreds of players from the league answered the call to serve their country.

Their stories, however, have largely been lost to time. While some of the more famous players, such as Joe DiMaggio and Ted Williams, have had their wartime experiences well-documented, the vast majority of players who served have been forgotten. Newspaper Accounts of Major Leaguers in World War Military Service aims to change that.
